"Of course, in saying this, only certain people have got something at the back of their minds. They suggest that France also was some hidden thought-some hidden design. It has been said that France wanted to install in Europe a sort of military supremacy, and that, after all, she wanted to be so simply to take the place Germany occupied before the "Gentlemen, perhaps this is the most painful, heart-rending and cruel thing that a Frenchman can hear, And for them to say, after the direful war from which we have just emerged-unprovoked war which we had to undergo-to be again in the cruel necessity to give to the world only the appearance that we have perfidious inten ons and military design-this, gentlemen, constitutes. I may say, the most disheartening thing for us.

"If we have not the full confidence of those who know my country, those that have seen it-they can testify that not one word of it is true. If there is a country that has deliberately turned her steps toward peace, that wants peace with all her heart, be-great part, at least, of the confidence of the German people, and that is lieves in it with her entire faith—if of the German people, and that is there is a country that does this, what we are listening to now.

"Gentlemen, I spoke a few moments ago of the moral aspect of disarma-ment, and I referred in my remarks ment, and I referred in my remarks to Germany. I do not want to be unjust—nothing is further from my mind. But we know there is in Germany—there is one part of Germany that is for peace. There are many people, especially among the working classes, who want to work, who have had enough of this war who have had enough of this war who have had enough of war altogether, and who are most anxious to settle down in peace and also to set to work. We shall do everything to help that Germany, and it she wants to restore her balance in the bosom of a pacific republic and democratic institutions, then we can help her, and we shall all be able to contemplate the future with feelings of security.

But, gentlemen, there is another Germany—a Germany which has not changed her mind and to which the last war has taught no lesson.
